From the Ohio Republican.

Richard M. Johnson.

The present Vice President R., M. Johnson, is a man with whom we have some acquaintance. Some of our Harrison editors have said a few hard things about Col. Richard M. Johnson, without knowing that they were unintentionally slandering one of the bravest soldiers of the last war, and one of the firmest friends that ever Gen. Harrison had the timately, and we speak by authority when we say there is nothing but the most kindly feelings entertained in the breasts of these honorable and distinguished men, toward each other Richard M. Johnson has been kicked to one side, by his Van Buren friends, but that makes no difference to us. We mean to tell a tale, the incidents of which we can prove by one of the most high minded and respectable men of Cincinnati. Elam P. Langdon, is the man we allude to, and although there are some hundred of others upon whose testimony we might rely, we name him in preference to all the rest, because, although a supporter of the present administration, he possesses a soul, on which in eight years' acquaintance we never discovered a single stain or blot. But to our tale which is not one of fancy. !

On a certain occasion, not far from the dog days of 1835, it was rumored among some of us Jackson men of Cincinnati, that Dick Johnson, as every body familiarly called him, was about to perpetrate a stump speech in Covington, which, as we presume all our readers know, lies exactly opposite to Cincinnati, in the State of Kentucky, a State too well known in history and tradition to require our feeble attempts to eulogize. Well we crossed the river in the ferry boat, went to the hall where Dick Johnson wasto hold forth, shook him cordially by the hand, and then sat down, along with Elam P. Langdon to hear his speech.

Steinp speeches in Kentucky are not preheult for a Kentucky stump orator, when he commences his speech to guess with much exactness as to its duration or peroration. The Kentuckians dislike to be humbugged, and they very height and flow of his elequence, a ques-

There was a pouse—and then there was silence, so profound, so indescribable that it was painful. In that vast crowd, for the space of one minute-and that is a long dreary lapse of time, to men who are listening to a stump speech -the ticking of a watch might have been heard as horribly loud as it has grated on our ear in the sombre chambre of the dving and the dead. But, anon, there was a slight clapping of hands -and, then, there was a deafening thunder storm of applause, that seemed to shake the very building to its foundation.

This is the same Richard M. Johnson whom the Locofocos, at their late Abortive Convention in Baltimore refused to re-nominate as their candidate for Vice President. He was too honest for them!
